Oregon's Water Color is a documentary film that is filled with serenity and peace. There is a calm ambiance that everyone is looking for and this is a good therapy when it comes to self-pause especially in this time of pandemic. The cinematography is fantastic. Director John Pings has captured one of nature's best through the rivers of Oregon. Every angle and shot have a lot to say and Mother Nature is telling us a deeper message through this creation that life is like flowing waters in the river. You keep on flowing as you have an essential value to all. This is one of the must-see documentary films this season. I love to see more of John Pings' works in the future as he gives pure inspiration to people.
