SYNOPSIS:

Summer is short film about two teenage girls in a Hasidic sleep-a-way camp who, despite their every effort to maintain their purity, explore a forbidden book which leads them to a sexual awakening neither of them are prepared to encounter.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT: PEARL GLUCK

In some ways, it should come as no surprise that I took up film to tell stories. The camera was always a presence in my family history, my Hasidic father behind the super 8, a silent witness to both the dissolution of a family and also its ultimate realignment. But where I come from, it's not part of the norm to watch movies, let alone create them, because it is considered a diversion from a life of piety, devotion, and modesty. Hence, the paradox of my cinematic projects: on the one hand, film has informed my entire life, on the other hand, it is entirely forbidden.

I was brought up Hasidic, and when I was in high school, I was the one who found the science books before the principal ripped out the chapter on Reproduction and Evolution. What I saw astounded me and I snuck into the library to uncover more of the censored world: I studied Our Bodies Ourselves like it was one of the five books of Torah without anyone discovering my secret self-awareness and sexual awakening. This is precisely why I am intrigued to see what may happen if I put the same book into the hands of two teenage girls in a summer camp. I, too, attended an all-girls Hasidic summer camps in the Catskills. I know what I encountered in that environment. What will they discover about themselves, their community, their faith, and their affinities.

In all my stories the gendered spaces are navigated through the power of individual choice and the intergenerational play between accountability, expectations, and the ensuing realities. My first narrative experiment, a short film I directed entitled Where Is Joel Baum, starring Lynn Cohen, Tibor Feldman, and Luzer Twersky, was shut down due to a Hasidic protest of 300 men at our first day of shooting. It is the story of an eighty-year-old Hasidic woman's renegotiation of her faith and her commitments to her family and community in the aftermath of a fatal crime. My first feature asks about the role of a self-perceived bystander with regard to the issue of sex trafficking at local truckstops. In many ways, and especially for Summer, all of my projects use ethnography and autobiography as guiding forces to explore the individual's role and her accountability to her community or family.

Biographies of the Filmmaking Team:

PEARL GLUCK • Director/Writer

Pearl Gluck's work has been part of the Sundance Lab, and played at the Cannes Film Festival, Tribeca Film Festival, and PBS. Her first documentary feature film, Divan (2004) opened theatrically at Film Forum in NYC, was broadcast on the Sundance Channel, and played across the country and internationally at festivals. Pearl's first narrative short, Where Is Joel Baum (2012), won prizes such as Best Actor at the Starz Denver Film Festival and Best Film at the Toronto Female Eye Film Festival. She continues to make both documentary and narrative films that explore themes of class, gender, and faith. Pearl teaches Screenwriting and Directing at Penn State University and is currently in post production on her first narrative feature, The Turn Out, a film that deals with sex trafficking at local truckstops.
