Thai prisoner boxes for freedom

A female Thai prisoner has boosted her chances of freedom by winning the world light flyweight boxing title.

Samson Sor Siriporn, a convicted drug dealer, beat Japan's Ayaka Miyano in a bout staged at the mixed Klong Prem jail, known as the "Bangkok Hilton".

Watched by dozens of prison staff, Siriporn won on points after 10 rounds in the ring, kick-starting parole proceedings for her early release.

The 24-year-old took up boxing to protect herself from violent inmates.

BoxRec

From Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

BoxRec or boxrec.com is a website dedicated to holding updated records of professional and amateur boxers, both male and female. It also maintains a MediaWiki-based encyclopaedia of boxing.

The objective of the site is to document every professional boxer and boxing match from the instigation of the Queensberry Rules up to the present times. BoxRec publishes ratings for all active boxers and all time ratings.^[2] Since 2012 the site has hosted Barry Hugman's History of World Championship Boxing.

Foundation [edit]

The site was founded by John Sheppard, an Englishman. Sheppard had never attended a boxing bout until 1995 when he attended a "Prince" Naseem Hamed fight with Hamed's older brothers Riath and Nabeel. Sheppard had considered boxing to be a "barbaric and degrading" spectacle, stating "I sat there watching people punch each other in the head, wondering why they were doing it... I was sprayed with blood, getting more and more miserable." However, Sheppard later explained, "[D]uring Naseem's fight, something clicked in my head. The subtlety of what he was doing, the genius of it all, became obvious to me. It wasn't a disgusting spectacle anymore. It was art, and I found myself cheering."^[3]

Siriporn, 24, also known as Siriporn Taweasuk, delivered a series of punches to Miyao, 23, who crashed to the canvas twice - in the fifth and sixth rounds - and won the match for the vacant world title at Klong Prem prison.

"I won't ask for anything else. They gave me a good chance (to fight in the world title match) and my life is better than before," Siriporn told reporters after the match, expressing satisfaction with her victory.

BANGKOK: Convicted drug dealer Siriporn Taweasuk (pic) will fight in a prison bout this week for a world boxing title that could win her early parole, the Thai corrections department said yesterday.

Siriporn, who goes by the nickname "Samson," will fight Japan's Ayaka Miyano for the vacant World Boxing Council female light flyweight today at a prison outside Bangkok, Thailand's prison boss Nathee Chitsawang said.

She is currently serving a 10-year sentence for selling small amounts of narcotics, with more than one year left in prison.
