A DANIEL D. MOSES FILM

PANDEMIC SPY

"A rather charming comedy short that is equally playful and measured"

★★★ - UK Film Review

“A very funny and innovative film about the spy's predicament in the pandemic. Very well cast and extremely enjoyable”
– Making Waves Festival

“Brooks Livermore is instantly likeable and his charisma makes even the exploration of the darker side of the pandemic feel bearable”

WHEN THE PANDEMIC FORCES THE GOVERNMENT TO KEEP PEOPLE OFF PARK BENCHES, A SPY CONTEMPLATES WHAT HE'S LOST DURING THE LOCKDOWN

SYNOPSIS

Did we ever stop to think how the lockdown would hinder the work of spies in the middle of a pandemic? With government restrictions keeping people off park benches, Fisher (may not be his real name) tries to adapt to the new reality, finding the things he took for granted, like having a secret conversation in a public space with his contact Penny, more difficult than before.

DIRECTORS STATEMENT

When the British government temporarily banned sitting on park benches during the worst part of the pandemic, my initial (and most important) thought was how hard that would make it for spies to do their job.

I wanted to tell a story about loss, the small freedoms, identity, friendships. We took for granted those small things however fleeting, so this is about finding humanity in a time of chaos and discombobulation and what a faff it is operating under restrictions, including making this film.
