"SISTER PSYCHO"

Sister Psycho has risqué and over-the-top situations that might be more than the normal voyeuristic movie goer wants to experience. But if experiencing a movie on a different level is what you desire then come see "Sister Psycho" in black and white and chocolate syrup.

SYNOPSIS

After stealing $40,000 from his employer, real estate agent Mario Crane runs away from his married girlfriend, his job and his life. He is overcome by exhaustion driving at night in a heavy rainstorm. Traveling on the back roads to avoid the police, he stops for the night at the ramshackle Bates Motel and meets the polite but skittish proprietor Nora Bate; a young woman with an interest in wood carving and a demanding relationship with her father.

HISTORY

Filmmaker Sean Green wanted it to push the envelope of the original story to include elements of Alfred Hitchcock's implied scenes and the original story of Ed Gein's horrific exploits. David Cronenberg's 1988 re-imagining of Bette Davis' 1964 movie "Dead Ringers" with the genders flipped may have influenced Sean's choice to change the Norman Bates to the female character, Nora; as well as a re-imagining of a plot scenario that has no boundaries. Originally all to be filmed in black and white with a 1990's 8mm camera, that choice soon became problematic. But some of the best performances had already been filmed early on with the Sony 8mm. Initially suppose to be a 2 minute fake movie trailer, "Sister Psycho" gain traction when Stephanie Kirves read the short screenplay and offered to help produce the film. Shooting started in October of 2022 and finished in September of 2023.

Watching "Sister Psycho" feels like your watching a 1960's interview with a mentally disturbed young lady. The black and white cinematography is so, that you're somewhere between watching a Hollywood movie like "Psycho" and the more independent film "Night of the Living Dead". About 15% of the movie is filmed with a Sony 8mm camcorder. The rest of the movie was filmed on smart phones and the whole movie was filmed in Sarasota, Florida.

About 1999 Sean rented the Vince Vaughn movie Psycho and was disappointed with only a reenactment of the original movie. It inspired him to write a more imaginative plot scenario and "Sister Psycho was born.
